Although this is a wonderful way to involve families in their children's literacy development, there are some issues to consider. Maintaining journals between home and school will require lots of organization and preparation. Furthermore, responding to the journals can be time consuming. Parents and teachers need to fully commit to this process in order for it to be successful.

Engaging Families details how these teachers and the students' families developed respected partnerships in the teaching/learning process. The authors share what they learned about creating an extended literacy community, identifying the primary themes in literacy development and suggesting parallel practices to reinforce them. But Engaging Families is not a prescriptive text, it is a description of one particular effort, featuring actual voices of children and parents.
