She also states that the biggest harm media power can yield is not in "creating killers, but in creating complacency." She likens the media to a "sheep in wolf's clothing," in that it seems scary, but underneath it is more of a follower than a leader. This is a very deep book, not to be read quickly or taken lightly, because in many ways, we owe it to our kids to try to understand what underlying forces truly shape their world and their worldview.

"It's Not the Media considers why media culture is a perennial target of both fascination and concern, and why we are so often encouraged to believe it is the root of many social problems.
