Need to Know is Karen Cleveland's first novel. Written while on maternity leave from the CIA, where she worked as an analyst, it was snapped up by a literary agent, sold after a "heated" auction in the United States and to more than 25 international publishers, and grabbed by Universal as a pending Charlize Theron project.

By now, this line has become a truism, but in its day, it was a philosophical reflection on the subjectivity of history and human experience. Great first lines can do that. They can take a look at an entire culture as a whole and You can't, of course, stay there forever.

No publisher I know would even consider a typewritten manuscript, let alone one submitted in handwriting. The publishing industry runs on Microsoft Word, so you'll need to submit Word document files .
