We all talk. Every day we must communicate with one another—at home, at the gym, in business meetings. And when we talk, it's because we want something. We want people to understand our point of view. We want to share information. We want to sell our products and ideas. But to be effective

And opportunities to pitch your business should happen all the time – because ultimately we're always pitching, whether it's investors, customers, business partners, candidates, spouses, or random people we catch on the street.

What we love was the fact that Pluto AI's startup pitch presentation began with the main problem and went “full circle” by reminding the audience the same info at the end of the presentation, making it memorable and capture attention.

Your pitch is the core of your presentation content. It represents your purpose, your call to action, and your future all in one. By definition, a “pitch” in the business world has nothing to do with a speeding curveball; instead, it describes the way that salespeople “throw” information at prospects.

It's quite simple: a pitch should have ten slides, last no more than twenty minutes, and contain no font smaller than thirty points. This rule is applicable for any presentation to reach agreement: for example, raising capital, making a sale, forming a partnership, etc.

Life's a Pitch is by two British advertising executives and it's split into two halves, the first on business and powerpoint presentations, the second on dating, verbal abus That and the ability to pucker up your lips and blow other people's trumpets for them.
