In their discussions of end-of-life care in a mental health institution, the participants articulated many commonalities between the mental health and palliative care philosophies and practice. The first issue of similarity is the idea of person-centred practice. Issues of concern to the client form the starting point for planning interventions within the person-centred approach to health care ...

Palliative care becomes important when we cannot offer a cure but can offer symptom management albeit without total control, so it can be applied to enduring mental health and substance use problems. We have a lot to learn from specialist palliative care professionals.

Background. This study explores the experience of palliative patients and their family members of a family meeting model, utilised as an instrument for the provision of spiritual Palliative care is an approach that improves the quality of life of patients and their families facing life-threatening illness. The prevention and relief of suffering is realised through early assessment and treatment of pain, or associated problems whether they be physical, spiritual or otherwise.
